A very different derivation may, perhaps, be assigned to the title of Rome s first king; and it may be treated as a compound of the words d njn, bvyin, romul, or, with the emphatic Win, romulu; A-shepherd-heretofore, the-quondam shepherd. On the last supposition, the appellation must have been assumed by the king himself, who, like God s servant David, had been taken from the sheepfolds and from following the ewes great with young; and it will bear testimony both to the humility and magnanimity of its royal author, and to the certainty of the legend of the she-wolf. The grand objection to this derivation of the name arises from the fact, that in the small store of Hebrew we possess, mul, (ante), is never used in respect of time, but has reference to place only. On the...
