After it had been stated that certain changes of the papilla nervi optici were almost constantly met with in cases of true Glaucoma, German Ophthalmologists believed themselves justified to look upon these alterations as the distinctive features of Glaucoma. These alterations are as follows: First, a change of form in the papilla, which appears concave; further, a change in the relation between the vessels of the papilla, and finally a pulsation in the art. centralis retinae. More recent observations have shown, however, that these alterations may be found in cases where the external phenomena of Glaucoma, as adopted by the older ophthalmological writers, are absent altogether. The consequence was, that the term Glaucoma was extended far beyond the former boundaries, and applied to cases that in older times were put under the head of amaurosis chorioidalis, amaurosis retinae, a. cerebrialis. It is, therefore, highly important, especially with respect to the therapeutic treatment, in order to bring about a proper understanding of this subject, to make the following distinctions: I. The inflammatory or acute Glaucoma, or the chorioidatis glaucomatosa, the ophthalmia arthritica of older writers. Symptoms: We find, as a rule, a period of premonitory symptoms, which are absent only in about one-fourth of the cases. During this time, the presbyopia with which the patients have already been affected for some time, increases still more; they moreover see from time to time rainbow colors, particularly in the immediate neighborhood of the candle...
