The Crescent Regiment from New Orleans had been ordered to dislodge them. And the brave fellows had charged down the hill, over timber and through underbrush and woods, yelling and firing as they went, though shot and shell were plowing long furrows through their ranks. But still on they pressed. They had passed the hollow, and were just beginning the difficult ascent on the other side. All hearts were aching and prayers were going up. And then the blue eyes of Breckinridge were filled with tears, as through a rift in the smoke he saw the line on the face of the hill begin to waver a little and then fall back. It was a fearful moment. Death was shrieking in a thousand shells all about us, and solid shots were tearing the limbs from the trees overhead. Something must be done, and quickly. Those deadly guns must be silenced, and those brave men supported. Among others of the Reserve Corps, the Nineteenth Tennessee Regiment was just back of the hilltop, waiting for orders. Breckinridge turned to his staff, and said: Gentlemen, is there a regiment here that can go to the relief of those men and silence that battery Col. Walker, modest as a woman, pure as he was modest, and brave as he was pure, spurred his horse forward and, touching his hat, said: General, I think the Nineteenth Tennessee can. Give them the order, Colonel! came the quick reply....
