Brand New Book  Print on Demand .GAO reported the results of a survey which it conducted to obtain data on whether experienced career personnel leaving the Navy earned more or less in their first private-sector job than they would have by reenlistment. The timeframe covered by the survey, fiscal year (FY) 1980 through the first quarter of 1982, was a period during which the services were trying to recover from serious recruitment and retention problems which were attributed to the failure of military pay to remain competitive with the private sector. For FY 1980 the survey showed that, on the average, people who left the Navy earned considerably more in their first private-sector jobs than they would have by reenlisting. Survey respondents also indicated that job skills learned in the Navy were valuable in obtaining private-sector work and that those who used their Navy-learned skills generally earned more than those who did not. Although reported starting pay in the private sector did not significantly increase for those who left the Navy during FY 1981, respondents reported that they earned about the same as they...
