Excerpt: . . . care of promptly where such attention will prevent an accident with consequent damage to track, or will ward off the need for some extensive repair work in the near future. Among the men now available for foremen there is apt to be a tendency to fail to appreciate the need for attention to small defects. There is also apt to be, on account of not making or carrying out a proper program of work, a failure to get the most good out of the insufficient help available. The increased amount of assistance and instruction which the foremen need from their superiors makes it advisable in many cases to reduce the roadmasters or supervisors territory. In addition to the benefits to be obtained from the immediate increase in supervisory force, the increase in the number of roadmasters positions will provide more prospects for promotion for...
