Not illustrated. 1913 Excerpt: . ninety-five children for whom complete records could be obtained, sixty-seven per cent gained in scholarship, twentythree per cent remained the same, and seven per cent lost. Of the twenty-three per cent who remained the same, --had been in the open air schools during the one to two years preceding and had been maintaining an average of over ninety per cent. In attendance, the records cover two hundred and four children; 63 per cent gained, 7 per cent remained the same, and 30 per cent lost. In connection with the apparently large number--nearly one third--whose attendance percentages were less than those of the previous year, --such records as these, which, of course, had to be placed among the losses, are significant. It is further interesting to note that the percentage of attendance for 1911-12 ran 94, 90, 96, 95 per cent for the open air schools, and for the open window rooms 85, 90, 91, 88, 94, 89, 86 per cent. The largest falling off in attendance came in rooms where no feeding was provided. The provision of food at school, the bath, the toothbrush, and the medical examinations furnish a basis for the study of personal hygiene in a very concrete way. It is much easier to demonstrate the value of a daily bath when you have before you twenty-five youngsters who have barely half an hour ago emerged, glowing, from a cold shower. Oral hygiene acquires new interest when individual toothbrushes are the property...
