Army War College, 1997 OCLC Number: (OCoLC)44376204 Subject: Democracy -- Haiti -- Congresses. Excerpt: . . . Various speakers emphasized that Haitis nascent and fragile democracy remains at risk. If international involvement is to make a difference, it must be appropriate to the countrys needs and capacities, and adequately, consistently, and carefully designed in concert with Haitian involvement and a long-range vision. If the United States and the international community do not respond appropriately to the aspirations of Haitian citizens for a legitimate, stable government, economic growth, and domestic security, there are likely to be major setbacks to the consolidation of democracy, including a possible breakdown in public order. Ultimately, of course, Haitians have the primary responsibility for their own destiny. Even if the United States and the interntional community respond effectively, it will be Haitians who will determine whether that response takes root. Neither the United States nor the international community has the intellectual or political capability to fix Haiti. Even if they provided all the necessary resources--plant all the trees, generate full employment, eliminate...
