Not illustrated. 1900 Excerpt: . . . 22 to the best of my knowledge and belief, phenacetin is the only product having any technical or commercial utility which had been produced by the acetylizing of any member of the species or class of amido-ethyl-ester-phenols. My familiarity with the literature of the subject enables me to state with confidence that all other experiments in the direction of acetylizing bodies of this species had resulted in mere useless chemical curiosities, and products. And not only so, but, in my opinion, such experiments had in some instances resulted in products which were so far from being useful, as to be detrimental and dangerous. 23 Dr. Hinrichs endeavors to support his position by a misinterpretation of the Centmblatt article. That article does not say that the existence of acetanilid or any other acid body indicated plainly the making of phenacetin, as Dr. Hinrichs contends that it does. On the contrary, the Centralblatt article states that the study of the clinical effects of the acetyl derivatives of the amido-phenols was indicated plainly, or near at hand, to Hinsberg, because of the fact that Hinsberg had already been occupied with their investigation. In other words, that Hinsberg, having already made phenacetin, it was near at hand for him to have the clinical experiments made with it. 24 In so far as defendants affidavits state that this Centralblatt article describes the product sufficiently to show that Hinsberg then had the same product as is claimed in the patent in...
